Discussing Our Family Trees: A Longitudinal Analysis of Online, Community-Based Communication in Genealogical Newsgroups

Introduction

Genealogists are inquisitive and communicative people, part of rich formal and informal communities of like-minded individuals. Community links are created out of choice, for enjoyment, sharing, and for dialogs of interest, though also created through necessity. The general pool of genealogical knowledge and resources are usually so large and diverse, no one genealogist could know it all; hence a community of information as support is required. Before the communication options available today however, informal and formal community links and communications of choice or necessity were often time-consuming and slow.

With the advent of the Internet, new and exciting options for communicating locally and internationally became available. In fact, over 35 million people in the USA alone have ‘done’ genealogy online (Maritz Research Inc., 2000). With message boards, chat rooms, mailing lists and newsgroups, people can instantly communicate with other genealogists and even find highly specialised groups. Genealogists are no longer hindered by physicality either; they can now communicate with like-minded people from all over the world. Though it is one thing to say genealogists are communicating on the Internet – is this communication successful? Is genealogy’s ‘archaeology of community’ found in the online space?

Some researchers use terms such as ‘online community’ (OC) and ‘common ground’ as important characteristics for successful online communication. Scoberth, Preece, and Heinzl (2003) use the term online community to describe “the communication and social interaction that is seen in Internet and web-based list servers, bulletin boards, USENET newsgroups and chats.” Common ground, as described by Whittaker, Terveen, Hill, and Cherny (1998), is a key principle of face-to-face conversations and refers to the fact that participants must establish a degree of mutual knowledge for their conversational contributions to be understood. Thus if participants in an online environment can establish common ground, the environment may be considered an online community.

What is known (and will be discussed later in this paper) is that genealogical USENET newsgroups are one of the most used forums online for genealogical communication. An opportunity therefore arises to use newsgroups to test for genealogical community online. As a result, my study uses the concepts of online community and common ground to test whether genealogical communities can be found online.

Genealogy and the Internet

Genealogy is one of the world’s most popular hobbies, with hundreds of millions of people around the world actively engaged in some form of family research. Defined as the “study or investigation of ancestry and family histories,” (1) researchers known as ‘genealogists’ build family trees person by person, family by family, to uncover those that walked the earth before them.

As a hobby, genealogists rarely participate in isolation – rather genealogy requires, and creates, community. Community is required in lieu of every genealogist learning the vast breadth of knowledge available for them to pursue the hobby. Community is created in part from this requirement, though also through the many varied communications genealogists conduct during their research efforts. For example, genealogists correspond with others to enquire on kinship connections, previous research, and sources of family history data. The relationships forged are rarely discarded; rather, initial conversations often turn into long-term relationships. In the same way, unique bonds are forged with strangers through the finding of a common link, the exchange of information, or at societies or conferences through commonalities of interest.

With the advent of the Internet, an opportunity for genealogists to broaden their community involvement occurred, allowing them to instantly conduct their enquiries and research far beyond their immediate localities. A plethora of mechanisms are available online to enhance their hobby and improve the many communications they conduct during their research. Some even propose the Internet has increased the hobby’s popularity (Fitzgerald, 2003; Howells, 1999; Lewis, 1998; Tedeschi, 2002), due to ease of access to genealogical information and resources, made possible by an internationally distributed, low-cost environment.

With the advent of the Internet, the communication needs of genealogists can be satisfied and enhanced in many ways. The Internet provides a varied set of interactions, an increase in productivity through resource sharing, forums for discussing research problems and shared experiences, and the ability to communicate with other genealogists and historians outside local Everyday people – who happened to be genealogy hobbyists – found the Internet as an opportunity to communicate outside their local, offline communities. This opportunity saw query boards such as GEN-CONNECT and GEN-FORUM created, and of course IRC Chats and numerous other ways to correspond, before USENET. The first USENET newsgroup “net.roots” was created in 1983 and renamed “soc.roots” in early 1987. From 1987 onwards, newsgroups quickly expanded to meet the growing interest and online needs of genealogists world-wide. To explain the rapid success of genealogical newsgroups further, I briefly summarise Margaret Olsen’s (1999) history of genealogical newsgroups.

Soc.roots was re-organised into seven sub-groups with the word “genealogy” in them to ensure they were easy to find. Separate “ethno” groups were then created to allow people outside the USA places to discuss genealogy, without having to wade through a large number of American posts. To that end, soc.genealogy.french, german, and jewish, were created. After this time, the soc.genealogy hierarchy of newsgroups was being used continuously and increasing demand was evident for narrower groups. The original newsgroups were soon joined by eleven more: a marketplace group, a medieval group and nine ethno/geographical groups. More narrowly-focussed groups were created in May 1997 and a major reorganisation of soc.genealogy.uk+Ireland into soc.genealogy.britain and soc.genealogy.ireland was successful in July 1997.

From this short history, we see a communication forum changing and evolving to better meet the needs of the ever growing number of genealogists online. While there is no doubt these changes were implemented to better organise the growing number of messages posted, I also suggest that genealogy’s ‘archaeology of community’ accounts for the fast rate at which newsgroups were embraced by genealogists as an online communication medium. That is, as I mentioned earlier, genealogy requires and creates community, thus genealogists are historically used to participating in communities. It is therefore only natural for those used to the idea and practice of community, to be able to successfully perform their community activities in another space.

Nevertheless, it has been several years since Olson’s history of genealogy newsgroups, and other forms of asynchronous communication have emerged online to rival them. Web-based news forums emerged in the late 1990’s, growing “out of the need for a more vibrant, centralised, easier-to-use communication medium” (Atkinson, 2003), and mailing lists were created, often as subscribe-to-use gateways to already existing newsgroups. It is at this point that I narrow the discussion of this paper: are newsgroups still used by genealogists in the majority for online communication? Are the communities required by genealogists evident in these newsgroups, and are genealogists participating in creating online communities?

Answering my first question regarding genealogists’ preferred medium, I utilise posting volume as Despite slight fluctuations in volume, overall, newsgroups are the medium in which genealogists post the most messages. Web-based forums, although slowly increasing in usage, currently perform at approximately ten percent capacity of newsgroup volume. Why then are newsgroups used for the bulk of genealogical communication rather than mailing lists? Although this is outside the scope of this study, I suggest for areas of broader interest such as genealogical research, newsgroups are a better choice; otherwise users need to subscribe to many mailing lists to get a broad scope and risk a barrage of email in their inbox.

Answering the second question however, the main premise of this study, has more far reaching considerations for genealogical newsgroup communication, therefore the remainder of this paper will attempt to find community in a newsgroup.

GENEALOGICAL NEWSGROUPS AS COMMUNITY-BASED COMMUNICATION

This section commences with an explanation of the models, chosen newsgroup, and data used for my study, before describing in detail the findings from an investigation of community in a representative genealogical newsgroup.
Methods

Framework

To create a framework with which to assess genealogical newsgroups as online communities, the quantitative methods of two studies entailing USENET newsgroups, common ground and online communities were utilised. The first study by Whittaker et al. introduces the Common Ground Model for testing online community presence. The second by Schoberth et al. presents the OC Model as determinants for online community in newsgroups.

Whittaker et al. analyse the interactions of 500 newsgroups and perform a set of tests to understand specific demographic, conversational, and interactive factors contributing to the establishment of common ground. Common ground, coined by Clark (1992), is the degree of mutual knowledge required for conversational contributions to be understood, and is cited by many other authors (Koschmann, Goodwin, LeBaron, & Feltovich, 2002; Mäkitalo & Häkkinen, 2002) as a factor for establishing community online. Therefore the casual modelling technique utilised for testing predictions of common ground is important to my study. Specifically, in using the determinants of their Common Ground Model, I can test whether newsgroup participants in my study can establish common ground and genealogical newsgroups may be considered online communities.

While the work of Whitaker et al. is focused on assessing common ground, the study of Schoberth et al. offers an additional model for generally assessing a newsgroup as an online community. The authors commence by performing a literature review on Whitaker et al., in addition to the models derived from two other papers on online community. Importantly, the authors recognise that Whittaker et al. did not consider time as a longitudinal component of the analyses: their proposition of common ground “is [therefore] not suited entirely” to the complete phenomenon of online communities, and cannot be considered in isolation when testing for the presence of community. This finding was the catalyst for my using two models in combination for this study, in addition to using a four-year dataset.

Additional research on USENET newsgroups and online community is also incorporated for comparative purposes to my findings (refer Festa, 2003; Jones & Rafaeli, 1999, 2000). Finally, I document other findings in addition to the two models that may further confirm or refute the presence of community in the focal newsgroup.

Focal Newsgroup

Fisher (1998, p8) states that a newsgroup “must have enough traffic to complete a reasonable traffic analysis and to have some idea of who is participating”. Therefore the newsgroup soc.genealogy.britain was chosen as the focal newsgroup for this study, due to its consistently high number of posts and posters. The newsgroup is unmoderated, and according to Olson (2001), available for genealogy and family history discussion among people researching ancestors, family members, or others who have a genealogical connection to any people in Great Britain.

Data Collection

Newsgroups statistics from the USENET Social Accounting Search Engine,(2) (http://netscan.research.microsoft.com/) formed the basis of the quantitative data required for the analysis. USENET archives from google.com was also be utilised as a supporting resource, such as the case of message contents.

The time axis for this study was divided into 48 months (3), and each point along the axis corresponds to a month of data. The data covers 1,373 days from October 1999 to September 2003, and represents the most recent four years of activity in the newsgroup at the time of this paper.

Common Ground Analysis

The first part of this study investigates whether the focal newsgroup can be considered an online community by assessing whether the group creates common ground. To test for common ground, I analyse the newsgroup in a similar manner to Whittaker et al.'s Common Ground Model; considering message traffic, group familiarity, conversation strategies, and interactivity.

Message Traffic

Before usage of the Common Ground Model, demographic statistics were calculated to ensure the focal newsgroup demonstrated mass-interaction, and the model could be used similarly to Whittaker at al. Posts to the focal newsgroup are extremely high when compared to the newsgroups in the studies of Whittaker et al., Schoberth et al., Fisher, and Patterson (1996). As the newsgroup received over 123,000 posts in four years activity, and averaged about 90 posts per day, including an average of 630 unique posters per month, these statistics confirm the presence of mass-interaction and thus justify the usage of Whittaker et al.'s Common Ground Model for this study.

Group Familiarity

The Common Ground Model’s first determinant, group familiarity, analyses the number of repeat participants to a newsgroup. This factor represents the number of authors who contributed at least one message to the newsgroup in the time period selected, who also posted in the previous time period. As these users return, they create familiarity within the group, and as Smith (2002) explains, newsgroup regulars and the size of the population of regulars is indicative of the maturity and stability of the space and increases common ground.

The constant level of returnees in the focal newsgroup (figure 2) confirms a set number of people, as a percentage of posters, are returning and maintaining the dynamic of the group. Specifically, 246 people on average per month are returning to the newsgroup, a retention rate of about 30%. Though are these returnees the same group of people each month or users who stay for a couple of months then leave? (4) While I look at this more closely in the User Experience determinant of the OC Model, the Common Ground Model utilises levels of participant contribution as supplementary analysis.

Single posters accounted for 26.75% of the focal newsgroups activity in 2000, and this rate has been steadily reducing by more than 2.5% per year, resting at 19.76% in September 2003. While it seems group participants are becoming more familiar over time, it is especially evident when compared to other studies: Fisher (1999) found 42% of posts were from single posters, and more than a quarter of Patterson’s (1996) “AGMers” were unfamiliar. Thus, if common ground can be found with much higher levels of singleton posters, common ground must be possible in my focal newsgroup with its much lower percentage.

With regard to participant inequality as a cause for the conflict between singleton posters and the newsgroup’s high participant contribution level, I find the top forty users in the focal newsgroup contributed an average of 30% of postings from 2000 to 2003. When considered in isolation, this metric does imply participant inequality, but when I also consider that 95% of these postings were replies to the threads of others, familiarity is displayed by these top forty posters always responding to the conversations of others.

Returning to the mean level of contribution to the newsgroup, the second indicator of unfamiliarity, participants in the focal newsgroup contribute an average of 25 messages each per month. When compared to the qualitative study of Fiore et al., – where subjects rated a contributor as familiar if they contributed more than 3 messages per month – the focal newsgroup exhibits high group familiarity.

Conversation Strategies

Cross-posting, Frequently Asked Questions (FAQ’s), and message length, are explored in the Common Ground Model’s second determinant, as measures of conversation strategies effecting common ground.

High levels of cross-posting, the simultaneous posting of one message to many newsgroups, are often the culprit behind a community’s struggle to create common ground. While Whittaker et al. suggest the emergence of cross-posting tends to decrease a newsgroups interactivity, Smith (2003) conversely notes that low cross-posting metrics are a sign of the “on-topicness” of a newsgroup. Common ground, interactivity, and Smith’s “on-topicness”, are not challenged in this way in the focal newsgroup, as apparent by a low cross-posting metric of 5%. Additionally, the removal of an anomaly in February 2002 – six times over the mean and caused by a single off-topic thread and associated flames – reduces this figure further to 4.3%.

Excluding the aforesaid anomaly from investigation, cross-posts are highly consistent with regard to topic in the focal newsgroup, due in part to the types of newsgroups cross-posted to. A large proportion of cross-post destinations are within the soc.genealogy, soc.history, or alt.genealogy hierarchy, creating strong communication ties with the broader genealogical newsgroup community. This evidence supports a long-time practice of genealogists, who regardless of medium, may concentrate on many simultaneous family lines, resulting in many concurrent research efforts in different time periods and regions.

The posting of FAQ’s to newsgroups is a conversational strategy says Whittaker et al., and increases the chances for common ground. The posting of such messages increase the chance for conversations to occur online, in lieu of the mundane and frequent questions posted that can be answered by the FAQ instead. Additionally, the presence of FAQ’s as socialisation methods for new members creates a feeling of belonging to the group, and the focal newsgroup of this study is no different.

By searching for the word “FAQ” in the messages of the focal newsgroup, and omitting (like Whittaker et al.) special cases such as “re: FAQ”, I find up to three different FAQ’s posted on a regular and ad-hoc basis. The Genealogy Meta-FAQ, a place to point out the various FAQs which may be of interest to genealogists in general, is posted once per year and due to its commonality to the group, accounts for under 1% of posts per year. Specific FAQ’s however, such as the “WHAT IS THE IGI”, and “Census-FAQ” mini-FAQ’s are posted more frequently on an ad-hoc basis, prove more on-topic for the focal newsgroup and increase common ground.
Likewise, the length of messages to a newsgroup can be investigated to uncover conversation strategies supporting common ground. That is, as Whittaker et al. explain, longer messages can be seen as an index of common ground. I therefore use mean line count to ascertain message length and find messages in the focal newsgroup are on average 27 lines long. This figure is lower than the findings of both Patterson and Whittaker et al. (33 and 44 lines respectively), though considerably more than the 8.2 lines found in the study of Schoberth et al. I also find that mean message length is increasing over time (figure 4), to an average of nearly 33 lines per message over the last six months, therefore I suggest not only is the focal newsgroup exhibiting a message length contributory to common ground, it is increasingly doing so over time.

Interactivity

Marc Smith explains the “core sociological data type of the Internet is not IP (Internet Protocol) numbers, or any of that stuff; it’s threaded conversations” (Festa, 2003). Similarly, Whittaker et al. employ average thread depth as a measure of interactivity and the third determinant in their Common Ground Model.

Conversational interactivity is the extent to which a given conversational contribution depends on prior context. NetScan however, the statistical base of my study, does not allow such collation of data beyond the top forty threads of the newsgroup. As a result, I utilise a unique variation on the Common Ground Model based on thread range for the top forty threads per month. Specifically, I analyse the minimum and maximum thread depths as a range, to reveal possible patterns of thread increase or decrease.
An analysis of thread range reveals thread depths increasing over time in the focal newsgroup (figure 5). As the community develops and becomes more mature, threads become longer, hence the community, over time, is becoming more interactive. When compared to the findings of Fisher, where the longest thread is 92 messages and mean thread depth is 11, the focal newsgroups longest thread of 184 messages creates the impression of highly conversational and interactive debates. Though like Fisher, I ask: are long threads merely two or three members in a standing, public debate? Or is it indicative of large conversations with many participants, representative of an interactive group? An analysis of the aforementioned 184-message thread confirms the latter, with 54 unique authors contributing to the thread.

Furthermore, I find that large threads have an additional dimension of interactivity beyond the Common Ground Model’s thread depth: elapsed time. While many authors may involve themselves in a long threaded conversation, some topics are found to continue for days, if not months in the focal newsgroup. As Mueller (n.d.) suggests, this warrants further investigation, as a delayed reply could stretch a thread’s length, symptomatic of lower interactivity.

Certainly in further analysing some of the longest threads in the focal newsgroup, I discover postings on broad topics such as ‘Coat of Arms’, or ‘English Kings and Queens since 1066 of pre-Norman English descent?’, that legitimately and actively continue for more than 30 elapsed days. Sometimes, in the case of the thread “What is the meaning of the term “Scot-Irish”, threads continue actively for up to 85 days. These long, highly-interactive conversations involve many community members, though they also stretch across time, as members come back to the conversation with more information. This concept increases common ground and is best explained by the research of Lockerd (2001): “a broad question or topic may have multiple dimensions on which people will respond back and forth, producing multiple sub-threads within the conversation.” Thus interactive conversations are created.

The Common Ground Model also uses the metric of unanswered newsgroup posts to uncover interactivity scenarios adversely impacting common ground. As Whittaker et al. suggest some newsgroup participants reply privately to newsgroup messages and as far as newsgroup metrics report, the message remains unanswered. For example, in the case of genealogical newsgroups, this may be due to topics about families still living; replying outside of the newsgroup protects identities from public view.

Moreover, with the increased usage of FAQ’s covering commonly posted questions in newsgroups, regular contributors will often ignore the same questions over and over, and perhaps simply ignore questions that could have been answered by reading the FAQ. Given these scenarios, it is perhaps not surprising that of the 123,776 messages posted since October 1999 in the focal newsgroup, 10% remain unanswered (figure 6). This finding is considerably lower than the 40% reported by Whittaker at al, indicating that the focal newsgroup is one where members try to address all attempts of conversation, allowing for the aforementioned instances associated with commonly posted questions and identity protection.

Before concluding the investigation of the focal newsgroup with the Common Ground Model, I suggest an extension of the unanswered post metric to better evaluate the interactivity of a newsgroup and hence common ground. Specifically, a determinant incorporating the number of times a thread is viewed, but not contributed to. This information would indicate if participants are skimming a newsgroup based on subject lines (and therefore ignoring those messages deemed answerable by FAQs or for other reasons such as non-interest), or actually reading the post (investing time) and then purposefully choosing not to answer them. This has far reaching implications for assessing common ground and community, though is not currently assessable by available quantitative methods.

Online Community Analysis

The second part of my study investigates whether the focal newsgroup can be considered an online community, using tests from the OC Model of Schoberth et al. Some of these tests are similar to the Common Ground Model, though they specifically investigate trends over time to establish community growth. The model incorporates determinants for relational and attributive communication activity, community size and external influence, communication strategies, and lastly, user experience.

Relational Communication Activity

The OC Model’s first determinant for online community is relational communication activity. As Schoberth et al. refer the definition of Jones and Rafaeli (1999), relational communication activity is the extent to which individuals refer to each others messages, and is indicated as threads. Using the findings from my earlier Common Ground Model analysis in terms of interactivity, I find an increase in average maximum thread depth from 34 messages in year 2000, to 131 messages in the year 2003. Members of the focal newsgroup are increasingly referring to the messages of other members and therefore practising relational communication. Schoberth et al. however also utilise an additional metric – the ratio of new threads versus unanswered threads – to measure relational communication activity in online communities.

The ratio of new threads versus unanswered threads – or the probability of an established thread resulting in a successful conversation attempt – is increasing in the focal newsgroup as the community matures. While new threads in the newsgroup study of Schoberth et al. saw a growth in positive probability of 55% to 65%, new threads in the focal newsgroup saw a similar increase: 48% to 55% over the four year period. Again, the focal newsgroup is demonstrating relational communication activity amongst its members.

Attributive Communication Activity

Attributive communication activity is the second determinant in the OC Model, and contrary to relational communication activity, it is concerned with the individual attributes of users. Again, as already measured in the earlier Common Ground Model test for group familiarity, users post an average of 25 messages per month in the focal newsgroup; a figure excessively higher than any other newsgroup study referred.

For instance, Schoberth et al. report 40 messages per user over six months, (about six messages per user per month) and Whittaker et al. report an even smaller metric: one message per user every two months. With a mean as comparatively high as 25 messages per user, attributive communication activity in the focal newsgroup seems extraordinary, therefore I must ask: does this finding suggest imbalances and heterogeneity of communication activity, such as newsgroup dominators? Certainly as indicated by Schoberth et al., research tells us often that a small minority of users usually posts the majority of messages in a newsgroup. This skews the norm and begs further investigation.

Statistics confirm up to 20% of users are contributing an average of 30% of all messages in the focal newsgroup. This finding concurs with Whittaker et al. as a high amount of messages coming from a small few, and at first glance is considered a negative impact to attributive communication activity. As Marc Smith states in Festa’s article however, regular contributors can be valuable contributors. I add that the presence of ‘value’ in dominator postings can actually mitigate any negative effect their dominance has on attributive communication activity. Therefore as the contribution metric alone cannot indicate ‘value’, I expand on the OC Model’s relational and attributive tests to assess whether dominators are in fact acting in a balanced manner in the focal newsgroup. The reply-to-post and thread-to-post ratios of some ‘dominators’ in the focal newsgroup can reveal if they are acting relationally and attributively in their communication efforts, creating positive and balanced value in the community.

The two most long-standing members of the focal newsgroup in terms of their active days, are used in this dominance profiling, as both have been part of the newsgroup for over half of every year in this study. They collectively contribute nearly 5% of all messages to the newsgroup, and while this percentage in isolation seems small, it historically equates to a total of 6,123 postings of human effort, or over 185 messages per month. What is more outstanding is that their reply-to-post ratios translate to extremely valuable community members.

To explain, the most active user has never initiated a message in four years of focal newsgroup involvement. With an average posting volume of over 100 messages per month, their high attributive communication activity is also highly relational. Similarly, while the second most active user did initiate some threads, over 95% of their posts per month are replies to the threads of others. The second ratio, thread-to-post, supports this analysis, as the ratio can indicate whether highly active users are dominating specific conversations (high conversational concentration), or whether they are proving value to the newsgroup by spreading their posts around all members. Both users have ratios of less than 2:1, therefore neither active member could be considered “dominators”, generally posting no more than two messages per thread. Considering the average thread depth for the focal newsgroup is 47 messages, their contribution equates to less than 5% of the average threaded conversation.

My deviation from the OC Model has determined that although the newsgroup seems to be dominated by a small few in terms of message volume and commitment, if this metric is investigated along side tests for community value, newsgroup dominators are found to be acting attributively and relationally in the community. Because of this balance, they are positively affecting the online community space. I now return to the OC Model and look to community size and external influences to the community.
Community Size and External Influence

Like Schoberth et al. explain, external influences such as advertising or publicity in mass media may stimulate communication activity. Other influences, they continue, are more specific to the community, for example, seasonal fluctuations. It is the latter that is of relevance to genealogical newsgroups.

Family gatherings, especially holidays such as Christmas, are traditionally “a great forum [for] letting other family members know” (Neill, 2001) about the specific interests of the family genealogist. I therefore expect the tools for genealogical communication are also used more around this time as a person’s interest in genealogy is revitalized or increased. External influences such as the Christmas season on genealogy is evident in the change of community size in the focal newsgroup (figure 7). Fluctuations in newsgroup membership are seen in the months of December and January each year. Community size in December 2001 grew 50% to 808 posters in January, only to return to 697 posters in February. It wasn’t until May 2002 that member numbers returned to pre-Christmas 2001 levels, perhaps indicating a number of posters in the periodic increase remained part of the community for up to six months.

Even as Schoberth et al. found community size had no direct influence on the communication activity of their group under study, they do however cite Whittaker et al. and their mention of information overload. Specifically, Whittaker et al. propose that user management of increased community size and posting volume may result in a change in the communication strategies of users, such as higher instances of unanswered messages. This strategy is evident in the focal newsgroup and is discussed under the next OC Model concept of communication strategies.

Communication Strategies

Schoberth et al. cite the two comparative USENET studies of Jones & Rafaell (1999; 2000), whose conclusions find users dealing with information overload in two ways: first, leaving the community, or second, filtering or ignoring messages. Posting volume for the focal newsgroup of my study almost doubled markedly in two specific months, therefore it is with these periods of posting activity I can explore the OC Model’s concept of communication strategies.

A slight decrease in the members of the community following high volumes of posts is also evident (though no more than 4% of users), therefore members of the focal newsgroup seem to be dealing with information overload for the most part by leaving messages unanswered, not leaving the newsgroup. This is a positive indicator of online community in this instance, as members are favouring membership of the community in times of information overload.

User Experience

While Schoberth et al. use mean membership duration for active users in a week as a measure of user experience, NetScan does not allow such collation of data beyond the top forty users of the newsgroup and their posting statistics. Therefore as a variation on the fourth determinant of their OC Model, I utilise four tests based on their definition of user experience in newsgroups as determinants:

Experienced users aggregate over time, write more and more messages, show more loyalty and are less influenced by the size of the community and external factors.

Additionally, I set the base criteria for an ‘experienced user’ in the focal newsgroup as any participant who contributed a minimum of one day of every week across the four year period.

<td>35.95%</td>
<td>36.43%</td>

</tbody>

Table 1 – Number of Experienced Users and Posting Percentages

In the first instance, Schoberth et al. say experienced users aggregate over time. I therefore use the number of posters who meet the base criteria to observe whether they are increasing. The number of these posters are indeed increasing over time as Schoberth et al. suggest, displaying a positive adherence to their definition of user experience. Experienced users more than doubled from 2000 to 2001 in the focal newsgroup, and by no less than 25% from 2001 to September 2003. I would expect, using this model and a logarithmic trend, that experienced users would total between 40 to 45 people by 2005, assuming the community continues to grow at the present rate.

Secondly, Schoberth et al. propose that experienced users write more and more messages over time, thus I use the percentage of postings by users who meet the base criteria versus total newsgroup postings. Again, positive user experience in the focal newsgroup is confirmed. While postings by experienced users were at 17.66% in 2000, by 2003, over a third of all postings are from them. Aggregate posts from this group of users are not the only indicator of user experience however; the number of posts per experienced user also increased from 339 in 2000 to 403 at the end of 2002.
That experienced users show more loyalty is the third test from Schoberth et al.'s definition for user experience. To examine this factor, I utilise the historical commitment of those newsgroup members meeting the base criteria in 2003, revealing patterns of increasing loyalty to the group. Although the aforementioned tests for increases in experienced users shows their numbers have increased, the historical paths they undertook to become 'experienced' in 2003 is somewhat surprising.

The final factor from the user experience definition by Schoberth et al., and concluding my usage of the OC Model to test for online community, is that experienced users are less influenced by size of community and external factors. Similar to the tests performed to investigate community size and external influences for the whole of the focal newsgroup community, I compare posting volume and active days for the aforementioned most experienced users for 2003 against the size of the community, and also seasonal fluctuations.

The analysis performed on the two most experienced users for 2003 reveal two very different responses to community size, and is the only factor of the OC Model to which this newsgroup performs contradictory to notions of online community. In terms of the level of participation in the group, or active days, both members increase their posting activity when the community swells. In saying this however, something different happens for the second most experienced user around May 2002. While their activity level ebbs and flows with community size, their level of commitment to the newsgroup remains high after May 2002: regardless of community size. I begin to suggest that after being involved in the community for some time, the user's participation in the community increased due to an increase of common ground, therefore their activity was not effected by community size, though this is unlikely due to their being part of the community for some two years prior to the change in behaviour. Other factors external to the group, such as personal time and level of interest may have impacted this activity and would be interesting to research at a future date.
No other effects of community size were found on either member. Similarly, the activity of both users were relatively unaffected by the previously identified episodes of increased usage due to the Christmas period. This finding falls in line with positive notions of online community.

Other Findings

With the analysis of the focal newsgroup concluded with respect to the Common Ground Model and OC Model, some general correlations and comparisons emerged. These involve poster and posting numbers over time.

!Diagram
Similarly, evidence of community is also displayed when I compare the number of posts in the focal newsgroup to the number of posts per user (figure 13). As the number of posts decrease, there is a clear pattern of increase for posting volumes per user. This evaluation could be the result of two phenomenon. The newsgroup could be strengthening as a community, as members conduct longer conversations in lieu of short attempts for information, and extraneous members who are not adding or finding value, leave. Alternately, the community may be losing common ground, therefore longer posts are required to obtain ‘value’ from the community and as a result, users leave. When I consider the decrease in unanswered messages however (figure 6, p7), in addition to the negligible rate of users leaving the newsgroup, the first suggestion of the focal newsgroup seems to fit. As a result, the focal newsgroup is strengthening as a forum for meaningful conversations, in a community of like-minded genealogists.

Conclusion

This study set out to find community in a genealogy newsgroup by using the models of two comparative studies on common ground and online community. To conclude that genealogists are using newsgroups for community-based communication, I draw on a number of conclusions about soc.genealogy.britain, common ground, and the presence of community using my findings from the Common Ground Model and OC Model.

Common ground is being created in soc.genealogy.britain, therefore from this perspective, the newsgroup is an online community. I found participants as increasingly familiar community members, being largely interactive in their communication activities, and conducting rich conversations as indicated by long threads. Cross-posts to and from the newsgroup, although low, are on-topic as they travel from other genealogy newsgroups; the interactivity of the group is therefore not adversely effected and common ground is sustained.

Factors leading to the conclusion that the newsgroup is an online community were also confirmed using the OC Model. I found newsgroup members to be participating at high levels of both attributive and relational communication activity; both identifiers of the presence of community. While dominators were found, they contribute positively to the newsgroup by almost always replying to the messages of others, rather than dictating conversation through excessively-created new threads. The group swells and contracts according to the seasonal fluctuations usually found in genealogy as a hobby, and as a result, community members are altering their communication behaviour to maintain their role with the group. Furthermore, experienced users are not only increasing in number in soc.genealogy.britain, they are increasingly loyal to the group and expend more time and effort – a sign of community ‘pillars’ forming in the community.

While community was found in the focal newsgroup, the generalities of my findings should be tested against other genealogical newsgroups in the future. Future work should also consider the interactions of genealogists from other newsgroups within soc.genealogy and other such newsgroup hierarchies, to form conclusions about the broader online genealogical community and their communication activities. Questions to be answered include: do genealogy newsgroups exist as individual communities or do they (at some level) aggregate to form an online ‘mega-community’ of genealogists? Are newsgroups a mix of question-and-answer and extended discussion forums or do specific newsgroups function (whether purposefully or by chance) as distinct types of communities?

What I can confirm is that while genealogists require communities to enhance and support their genealogical research efforts, community-based communication is available in genealogy newsgroups. Furthermore, genealogists are making the choice to continue these communities by participating in USENET newsgroups for genealogy.

Biography

Kylie J. Veale holds post-graduate degrees in Information Environments and Internet Studies from the University of Queensland and Curtin University of Technology in Australia. Her recent works explore the Internet gift economy and reciprocity in First Monday, and the Internet as a virtual learning environment for hobbyist genealogists in the forthcoming Handbook of Virtual Learning Environments.

Currently a PhD student in Media and Information at Curtin University, Kylie was recently chosen to attend the Oxford Internet Institute’s Doctoral Programme for 2004. Her current interests are metaphors of the Internet as frameworks for investigating Internet usage; how the Internet is used to engage in leisure pursuits; and the online community of genealogists as a case in point.

Notes

(1) http://www.dictionary.com

(2) Some issues were discovered using NetScan as a statistical resource and most if known in advance could be overcome with manual data collection. That the database uses aliases in lieu of exact email addresses to identify authors made considering the attributes of specific authors in this study problematic. For example, posters such as “guy.etchells@virgin.net (Guy Etchells)” and “Guy Etchells <guy.etchells@virgin.net>” are considered different authors statistically in NetScan, though in reality, they are the same person posting. Nevertheless, this issue was taken into account and overcome alias by alias using NetScan’s Find Author by Email address feature.

(3) The months August, September, and October of 2000 were removed from the study, as there seemed to be an anomaly in the data collected by NetScan. For example, NetScan reports on 25th August 2000 that no messages were posted to the group, however data available on Google Groups reveals 52 messages were posted that day. Similar anomalies were found in the other months removed.

(4) It would be interesting in future work to investigate the fall-out rate of this newsgroup in terms of participant turnover in the community. I would suggest this figure to be low as the sense of community in this newsgroups seem to be high from the 'common ground' created.

(5) A FAQ or Frequently Asked Questions document – there are now over 4,000 separate FAQ files, written by over 1,500 authors and covering over 2,150 newsgroups.

Hi! How are you? I just wanted to mention that I enjoyed reading your article/post/blog post. It was quite inspiring and helpful. Keep on posting!

I appreciate that you take the time to create and publish content. It encourages continued engagement and conversation.

If you have any questions or comments, feel free to share them. I look forward to hearing from you.

And, if you are posting/writing on other social sites or online places, I’d love to follow along and keep up with your work. Let me know if you want to be added to my social media feeds.

Thank you for your contributions and for sharing your passion with others.

Best,

My coder is trying to persuade me to move to .net from PHP. I have always disliked the idea because of the expenses.

But he’s trying none the less. I’ve been using WordPress on a variety of websites for about a year and am nervous about switching to another platform. I have heard fantastic things about blogengine.net.

Is there a way I can transfer all my WordPress posts into it?

Hello! I could have sworn I’ve been to this blog before but after looking at some of the posts I realized it’s new to me.

Terrific! This is the type of information that should be shared around the internet.

Disgrace on the search engines for not positioning this higher! Come on over and discuss with me.

Thank you =)

Heya! I am here for the first time here. I found this board and I find it truly useful & it helped me out a lot. I hope to give something back and help others like you helped me.

Hi there! I think your site might be having browser compatibility issues.

One far more issue I wish to talk about is that as an selection to trying to accommodate all your on the web degree lessons on times that you simply end jobs (since the majority folks are tired when they get home), try to obtain most of one’s instructional classes on the week-ends and only a couple courses in weekdays, even if it methods a little time away in the saturday and sunday. This can be very good since on the saturdays and sundays, you might be a lot more rested as well as concentrated in school work. Thanks significantly to your several points I have figured out through the site.

Amazing blog! Do you have any tips for aspiring writers?

I’m planning to start my own website soon but I’m a little lost on everything. Would you recommend starting with a free platform like WordPress or go for a paid option? There are so many options out there that I’m completely overwhelmed ..

Any recommendations? Thanks!

Whoa loads of excellent facts!
When someone writes an paragraph he/she keeps the thought of a user in his/her mind that how a user can know it. Thus that’s why this piece of writing is outstanding. Thanks!

Kudos, A lot of write ups.

Great advice Thanks a lot.

Many thanks. Good information!

Hiya! I know this is kinda off topic nevertheless I’d figured I’d ask.
Would you be interested in exchanging links or maybe guest writing a blog post or vice-versa? My website addresses a lot of the same topics as yours and I feel we could greatly benefit from each other. If you are interested feel free to send me an email.
I look forward to hearing from you! Terrific blog by the way!

Hi there! Hello, I enjoy reading all of your article post. I like to write a little comment to support you.

I always spent my half an hour to read this blog’s articles or content everyday. I always emailed this blog post page to all my friends, because if like to read it then my friends will too.

My coder is trying to convince me to move to .net from PHP. I have always disliked the idea because of the expenses. But he’s trying none the less.

I’ve been using Movable-type on a variety of websites for about a year and am nervous about switching to another platform.

I have heard fantastic things about blogengine.net. Is there a way I can transfer all my wordpress content into it? Any kind of help would be greatly appreciated!

Hello! I could have sworn I’ve been to this blog before but after browsing through some of the posts I realized it’s new to me.

Terrific article! This is the type of information that are supposed to be shared around the web. Come on over and talk over with my site.

Thank you! Heya for the first time here. I came across this board and I find it useful & it helped me out (a lot|much). I hope to give something back and {help|aid} others like you {helped|aided} me.|}
