Readers, Readers Everywhere

Lauren Kessler

University of Oregon

Follow this and additional works at: http://commons.pacificu.edu/olaq

© 2014 by the author(s).

OLA Quarterly is an official publication of the Oregon Library Association | ISSN 1093-7374 | http://commons.pacificu.edu/olaq
Readers, Readers Everywhere

by Lauren Kessler

With all the talk about how no one reads anymore and how the book is dead—I’ve gnashed teeth, wrung hands and written about this myself—I’d like to report back from the hinterlands that it ain’t so. To paraphrase Mark Twain: The news of the death of literature has been greatly exaggerated. We writers may not have to abandon our craft and rush out to get honest employment—or take on PR clients.

What is the source of my wild optimism? It’s called Oregon Reads, a statewide program that took place in nearly every public library and in every county in my home state of Oregon during our sesquicentennial celebration (that’s 150 years). Masterminded by those mild-mannered defenders of the faith, those bi-focaled bastions of literacy, the state’s librarians, the program was amazingly, exuberantly, vibrantly successful.

The librarians chose three books—a work of narrative nonfiction, a young adult novel and a children’s book—wrote grants, beat the bushes and otherwise raised funds to buy copies of these books. Libraries, through the work of their dedicated foundations, also raised funds. (Let’s pause a moment here to marvel at the fact that people are using their time and energy to fundraise for literature—and that these efforts have actually been successful, especially in these trying economic times) The result was the purchase and distribution of thousands and thousands of these books, boxes of books, palettes of boxes, sent to major metropolitan libraries and tiny old Carnegie libraries, libraries in wealthy suburbs and out in cowboy country, in coastal retirement communities and in dying timber towns. Many of these libraries not only acquired and distributed these books but hosted a variety of public programs in their communities. At these programs, which ran from January through April of this year, sometimes as many as 600 people gathered in an auditorium to listen to an author talk about her book.

I know. I was privileged—honored—to be the author of one of the three books chosen for Oregon Reads. The book, a work of narrative nonfiction, was Stubborn Twig, a story of the promise and peril of becoming “American,” an immigrant story, an Oregon pioneer story, told through the lives of three generations of a single family. I spoke in eighteen venues, from community rooms in libraries to school auditoriums to converted movie theatres, and everywhere I went there was excitement.

Excitement.

Not just about the book everyone was reading but about stories, about the power of stories in our lives, about how stories can tell us who we are and who we were. And equal excitement about libraries and their essential place in the life of communities.

Cover of Stubborn Twig
I was—I continue to be—flabbergasted by the intensity of involvement, by readers I thought did not exist, by librarians who have not slackened their pace despite budget cuts and understaffing, by business-people who donated money, who in some towns I visited hosted me in their hotels (a shout out here to the amazing Geiser Grand Hotel in Baker City, Oregon).

At each of the public events, I was deluged with questions. People wanted to know why I wrote what I wrote, where I got my ideas, how I did my research, how I wrote. They were hungry to understand the life of a writer and the life of a book. They followed me out of the library. They e-mailed me the next day. And no, it wasn’t creepy. It was wonderful.

And so I am back from the hinterlands, from Pendleton and Ashland, Lincoln City, Hood River and Bend—from those small cities and smaller towns that no one outside of Oregon even knows the name of—and I am, like the new immigrants I wrote about in Stubborn Twig, overblown with hope.

There are readers out there, plenty of them.

The Author

Lauren Kessler (www.laurenkessler.com) is the author of five works of narrative nonfiction, including the Oregon Library Association’s Oregon Reads selection Stubborn Twig and, most recently, Finding Life in the Land of Alzheimer’s, winner of both the Pacific Northwest and the Oregon Book Awards. She is the editor of Etude and directs the University of Oregon’s program in Literary Nonfiction. See http://thinhouse.net for news of Lauren and family’s energy independence project.